A growing number of homeowners planning to sell their houses are becoming aware of the advantages of hiring a professional home stager, such as Catherine Brown of London, to prepare the property before it goes on the market.

Sell faster and for more money is the slogan of home stagers. Home stagers form a growing new group of professionals who help home sellers get their asking price — or more — and in short time.

First impressions count, no matter what you're selling. In the real-estate market, a house has about 90 seconds to make an impression. Home stagers ensure it will be a good one. They create a series of impressions from room to room, highlighting the home's best features and space.

"I depersonalize and neutralize a house so others can see themselves in it," said Catherine Brown, owner of Staged to Move in London.

The difference between decorating and staging is important. People decorate for their taste and lifestyle. But when someone else views a home with an eye to purchasing it, they need to be able to picture themselves in it. And that means clearing the individual quirks.

"The way you live in a house and the way you sell it are two different things," said Jody Wakelin, co-owner of London Home Staging.

"It is hard for sellers to look objectively. Their home is full of memories. It's emotional," said Brown.

Staging a house before putting it on the market helps sellers obtain top dollar. A recent report indicated 90 per cent of homes in Sacramento, Calif. were staged.

"We're nowhere near that in Canada, but it is picking up," said Wakelin.

As a result of the growing popularity of the service, the number of those persons getting into the business is increasing. There are two accredited associations: Accredited Staging Professionals and Canadian Staging Professionals. Their websites help sellers locate a stager in their area. Training is provided for members.

Many stagers are also real estate agents; some are interior designers or decorators. Others come from a variety of backgrounds, including banking, project management, engineering and business.

"My sister, Kristin MacDonnell, and I always had an interest," said Wakelin. "We took the course and started our own business. It's really rewarding to see the before and after photos of a place."

Brown saw the need. "I realized there was a market for helping people ready their homes for sale. After high school, I took merchandizing and design and worked in Toronto. When I moved back, I drifted into other work, but missed the creative side."

Clients are often referred to stagers by their real estate agents. Fluffing and de-cluttering comes after a consultation. The stager looks at the house from a buyer's perspective. They will make notes, take photos and ask the seller questions about budget, time and what they want to do themselves or hire a tradesperson to carry out.

Professional home stagers can make a dramatic difference in the appeal a house makes. In the example at right, the bedroom in a Westmount home was given a makeover by Catherine Brown of Staged to Move, who changed the look from dark and foreboding to warm and inviting. Despite the property going on the market during a typically slow period in the real estate business, the relatively inexpensive changes to the home boosted its appeal and helped generate a sale after the first agent open house.

"I write a report and prioritize the top 10 things so the seller can concentrate their time and money, and give them a game plan," said Brown.

If the seller also wants the stager to execute some of the recommendations, they can provide a number of services.

"We strip a room to nothing," said Wakelin. "Then we go back and place neutral pieces to make it look attractive and lived in, but not too personal."

"Kitchens and bathrooms sell most houses," said Wakelin. She suggests walls, flooring and storage space are the projects that will yield most results.

"And cleaning — it's the biggest thing people can do. I can't believe how many people don't do it."

Brown agrees. "People are turned off by other people's dirt and dust. I try to be tactful when I tell them, but that's why a lot of agents hire stagers," said Brown.

In some cases, a professional home stager's input involves little more than a tidy-up of the house, as these before-and-after photos demonstrate.
